Working Papers

“Local public goods as amenities: Evidence from London”

Abstract: This paper seeks to shed light on the role of local public good provision on location sorting and city characteristics. A classic quantitative urban economics model is augmented to integrate local public goods as a factor of residential amenity value. Detailed data on London is used to take advantage of a natural experiment to fully parametrise the model. The model is then used to simulate a policy counterfactual in London, where the government is choosing to further increase the degree of fiscal decentralisation. The model shows that this has important distributional consequences driven by how workers and firms decide to sort. This results in higher equilibrium prices and wages in areas that benefit from decentralisation, combined with an outflow of firms and workers from areas that are hit harder.
